Change Management

Organizational change management (HCMBOK): people engagement, communication and sustainable adoption.

> I reduce the risk of the transformation stalling on the people side: active sponsorship, communication and measured adoption.

CORE CAPABILITIES

I map impact and readiness — I identify who is affected, to what degree and how prepared each area is, before the change reaches the operation.

I prepare the sponsorship — I align the executive sponsor and the middle management layer, which is where change usually stalls.

I build the communication plan — I define message, audience, channel and calendar, so each group knows what changes before it is affected.

I develop internal champions — I train people from the organization itself to sustain the change without depending on an external consultant.

I address antagonism case by case — I identify the sources of resistance and work on them with the manager of each area, instead of treating them as noise.

I measure adoption after delivery — I define effective-use indicators and follow the adoption curve after go-live, when most projects have already closed.

HOW I WORK

Talks and keynotes — why transformations that are well delivered still fail to take hold.

In-company training — HCMBOK (Human Change Management Body of Knowledge): I pass on the method for the team to lead its own changes.

Hands-on workshops — the team builds the impact map and the communication plan for its own change, and leaves the session with both finished.

Readiness assessment — a reading of the affected audiences and their level of preparation, with the sources of resistance identified and a recommendation.

Change leadership within the project — I work alongside the project team, from planning to go-live, accountable for adoption.

Post-implementation support — I follow the adoption curve and the internal champions after delivery, until the new way of working becomes the standard.

Scope and duration are defined by the size of the organization, the number of people affected and the complexity of the change. The project delivers the system, change management delivers the use — leading the initiative itself is covered in the Project Management section, and redesigning the workflow in the Process Management section.

Let's talk before your next transformation goes live.
